Nothing daunted by this terrible situation, the brave captain set to work to repair the sudden disaster, by making a new rudder of some deals and a spare topmast bolted together. This was put over the stern, and intended to act as a steering-oar by means of a tackle. But it would not work, the ship could not be brought up to the wind, but lay in the trough of the sea, rolling like a helpless log upon the waters. It was taken up, and the fore part of the ship lightened of some of its cargo to see if it would steer better. The rudder was then weighted, and put over the side again. Either the weight was too great, or the violence of the waves broke the spar ten feet from the ship, and...
