This significance is also acknowledged within the European Union where they exert already a great influence in all European institutions. The European Council, the Council of Ministers as well as the Commission are mainly constituted of senior party figures . All political parties that are members of a national governing coalition are automatically sucked into the management of the Union. However, political parties do not dispose of the same resources and support than they do at national level. This is, for instance, sensible looking at the very low turnout rates in elections for European Parliament and opinion polls reflecting little identification with European parties. National party elites often neglect or avoid European issues during the campaigns in favour of domestic issues. But since the process of European Integration and Enlargement is proceeding, there arises the need to enhance a genuine European party system. It is widely acknowledged among European politicians that the institutional, legal and also actual power of European political parties did not keep pace with this development and need to be extended, as they are intermediators between society and government and even political entrepreneurs of effective liberal democratic systems . This paper deals with the question, whether a genuine European party system exists, or respectively why it does not exist (already). Such a party system comprises...
