Chase: Delivered at the Republican Mass Meeting in Cincinnati, August 21, 1855; Together With Extracts From His Speeches in the Senate on Kindred Subjects Mr. Chairman and Fellow Citizens: More than thirty years have passed away since I, then a mere boy, became a dweller in this city. Few of those whom I now see before me have been here so long: to none of you, I am sure, is the prosperity of this beautiful city, or the advancement, in all respects, of her noble institutions, more dear. A boy citizen of the city before most of you were born, I have witnessed her progress with mingled pride, joy and gratitude; and in my measure and sphere have diligently sought, and shall always seek, to promote her welfare. Here in Cincinnati are all my interests centered. If she prospers, I partake in her prosperity. If she suffers, I, as well as the rest of you, must share the reverse. Bound thus to you by common interests, and common hopes, and...
